UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

Plaintiff-Appellee,

versus

MAURICE FAYNE,
a.k.a. Arkansas Mo,

Defendant-Appellant.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia
D.C. Docket No. 1:20-cr-00228-MHC-JKL-1

Before LUCK, LAGOA, and ANDERSON, Circuit Judges.

PER CURIAM:

Maurice Fayne appeals from his 210-month sentence imposed after he pled guilty pursuant to a plea agreement that required the government to recommend a 151-month sentence. Fayne argues that the government breached the plea agreement at sentencing when it emphasized his criminal history and the details of his offense and failed to meaningfully argue for the sentence that it agreed to recommend.

Whether the government breached a plea agreement is a question of law that we generally review de novo. United States v. Hunter, 835 F.3d 1320, 1324 (11th Cir. 2016). But where the defendant failed to raise the issue before the district court, we apply plain error review. United States v. De La Garza, 516 F.3d 1266, 1269 (11th Cir. 2008). “To establish plain error, a defendant must show there is (1) error, (2) that is plain, and (3) that affects substantial rights.” United States v. Moriarty, 429 F.3d 1012, 1019 (11th Cir. 2005). If all three factors are established, we may exercise our discretion to correct the error if it “seriously affects the fairness, integrity[,] or public reputation of judicial proceedings.” Rosales-Mireles v. United States, 138 S. Ct. 1897, 1905 (2018).

An error is plain if it is clearly contrary to settled law. United States v. Shelton, 400 F.3d 1325, 1331 (11th Cir. 2005). For an error to affect substantial rights, it must have been prejudicial, meaning that “[i]t must have affected the outcome of the district court proceedings.” De La Garza, 516 F.3d at 1269 (quoting United States v. Olano, 507 U.S. 725, 734 (1993)). The defendant has the burden of persuasion as to prejudice. United States v. Rodriguez, 398 F.3d 1291, 1299 (11th Cir. 2005); Shelton, 400 F.3d at 1331–32. If it is unclear whether the government’s breach of a plea agreement affected the defendant’s sentence, the defendant cannot show plain error. See De La Garza, 516 F.3d at 1270–71.

A plea agreement is analyzed according to the defendant’s reasonable understanding in executing the agreement. United States v. Rewis, 969 F.2d 985, 988 (11th Cir. 1992). To determine whether the government breached a plea agreement, the court must determine the scope of the government’s promises. United States v. Copeland, 381 F.3d 1101, 1105 (11th Cir. 2004). The government is bound to any material promise that induces the defendant to plead guilty. United States v. Hunter, 835 F.3d 1320, 1324 (11th Cir. 2016). Nevertheless, implied obligations not agreed to by the parties will not be inferred. See United States v. Benchimol, 471 U.S. 453, 455 (1985) (“[O]ur view of [Federal Rule of Civil Procedure] 11(e) is that it speaks in terms of what the parties in fact agree to, and does not suggest that . . . implied-in-law terms [be] read into [a plea] agreement.”). There is generally no limitation about what information a district court may receive for sentencing purposes concerning the background, character, and conduct of a person convicted of a federal offense. 18 U.S.C. § 3661.

For example, in United States v. Levy, we held that the government did not breach a plea agreement that required it to recommend concurrent sentences when it made “grudging and apologetic” references to the agreement, asserted that its hands were “tied,” and that its sentencing recommendation was given “with a heavy heart.” 374 F.3d 1023, 1030–32 (11th Cir. 2004), vacated and remanded on other grounds, 545 U.S. 1101 (2005) (vacating and remanding because of the intervening decision in United States v. Booker, 543 U.S. 220 (2005)). We concluded that because nothing in the agreement prevented the government from providing information about Levy’s offenses, it had fulfilled its obligation to recommend a particular sentence. Id. at 1030.

Similarly, in United States v. Carranza, we held that the government did not breach its promise in the plea agreement to not recommend a sentence when it argued against defense counsel’s recommendation of twenty years’ imprisonment on the ground that Carranza was the “kingpin” in the criminal enterprise. 921 F.2d 1557, 1569 (11th Cir. 1991). We found that the government’s characterization of Carranza was relevant conduct for sentencing purposes, the plea agreement reserved the government’s right to inform the court “of all facts relevant to the sentencing process,” and the government never agreed that it would refrain from characterizing Carranza as a kingpin. Id.

In contrast, in United States v. Johnson, we held that the government breached a plea agreement that bound it to represent that “an amount of marijuana not greater than 100 pounds should be attributed to this defendant.” 132 F.3d 628, 630 (11th Cir. 1998). The Presentence Investigation Report, however, recommended that Johnson be held accountable for 1,400 pounds of marijuana. Id. When the district court inquired into the difference in amounts, the government explained that a co-conspirator had not been interviewed until the day after the plea agreement was made and that the co-conspirator’s credible testimony “substantially and drastically” changed the amount of marijuana involved. Id. We determined that the government violated the plea agreement when it failed to represent that Johnson was responsible for only 100 pounds of marijuana and instead “became an enthusiastic advocate for a ‘fact’ at odds with the ‘fact’ to which [it] had stipulated.” Id. at 631.

Opinion of the Court

Here, even if the alleged error was plain, Fayne cannot show that the district court erred by not finding that the government breached the plea agreement. The government’s remarks about Fayne’s criminal history and the details of his offense were made pursuant to a reservation of rights in the plea agreement, and the plea agreement did not preclude the government from arguing against Fayne’s request for a 120-month sentence. Regardless of whether the government grudgingly honored its recommendation after learning about Fayne’s criminal history, it nevertheless fulfilled its obligations under the plea agreement when it opened and closed its sentencing argument by reiterating that it stood by its recommendation.

Further, assuming arguendo that Fayne could establish error, he cannot meet his burden of showing that it affected his substantial rights. Based on the district court's statements at sentencing, it is unclear, at best, whether the government's alleged breach of the plea agreement affected Fayne's sentence and, thus, he cannot show that any error prejudiced him.

Accordingly, we affirm.

AFFIRMED.
